08:30-08:40	Opening Remarks Prof. Donald Chang School of Business Metropolitan State University, USA
08:40-09:20	Keynote Speaker Speech 1 Dr. Hing Kai Norwich Business School, University of East Anglia Title: Non-native cultural values and its effect on consumer's attitudes towards e-commerce strategy Abstract: Nowadays it is obvious that the Internet has become an integral part of this hectic era of human life. It is no surprise therefore that businesses are to integrate the Internet into their operations, converting themselves into so-called e-businesses to attract global customers in the hope of achieving competitive advantage not only now but also in the future. At the same time realise that e-commerce strategy is not always an advantage in every consumer market. According to research into cultural effects on consumer willingness to shop online, businesses need to adjust their e-strategies to reflect the cultural preferences and requirements of any target market. This however appears to be no longer enough to ensure e-commerce strategy success. It seems that now e-businesses have to face a new challenge brought about by globalisation and mass migration as today's consumers are espoused not only to their native cultural values but are also exposed to the effects of non-native cultural values. Consequently while recognising this new challenge, there is a need to reassess well-established and extensively tested intention-based models to investigate if and to what extent the exposure to non-native cultural values affects consumer attitudes towards e-commerce, and hence their willingness to purchase products through the online shopping platform.
09:20-10:00	Keynote Speaker Speech 2 Prof. Donald Chang School of Business Metropolitan State University, USA Title: Environmental Messages and Subjective Evaluations: Empirical Results and a Research Proposal Abstract: Environmental sustainability has emerged as an increasingly important consideration among consumers who are concerned with the impact of human activities on the natural environment. Due to consumers' growing attention to green issues, companies have increased their effort in addressing these important issues by modifying product offerings and communication strategies. Firms have started to incorporate environmental messages on product

	packaging and advertisements and employ online media to relay such environmental concerns via mass online media and corporate websites. As more consumers turn to the Internet for information, it is imperative to examine the effectiveness of such online environmental messages. Of the range of consumer products and services, travel services are at the forefront of environmental concerns. Traveling leads to energy use and pollution. Traffic count at a destination has direct impact on the natural environment as well as the welfare of local residents (Giannoni, 2009). Environmentally sensitive consumers seek out environmentally friendly alternatives. As a result, travel managers have started to embrace environmental sustainability by exploring approaches that help select and evaluate sustainable indicators that they could use (Schianetz & Kavanagh, 2008) to achieve a balance among the interests of various constituencies. The ability of travel managers to promote selected discriminating factors tailored to the customer’s travel motivation can be rewarding. Environmental factors, such as natural resources conservation, have been included as factors that are incorporated to form a destination’s image (Beerli & Martin, 2004). To effectively communicate with such niche eco travelers, travel marketers have to develop an integrated marketing campaign that could effectively relay their environmental effort to the target audience. One widely adopted communication approach is the use of online medium, specifically, a company’s website (Park & Gretzel, 2007). With the broad acceptance of the Internet as a communication vehicle, travel managers have learned to develop online content that conveys important messages (Hankinson, 2007). The present study examines the types and effects of online environmental messages in the context of travel marketing. Websites of 153 golf resorts were audited by trained student reviewers. Identified environmental messages via site audits include environmental promotion claims and information statements, both were further classified into objective and subjective messages by their tangibility. The results indicate a significant effect of objective claims and statements on subjective evaluations among trained site reviewers, surrogates for informed travelers. Subjective claims and statements failed to yield significant effects. Future research directions and managerial implications are offered. Keywords: Environmental Messages, Resorts, Subjective Evaluations, Website Audits

Pre-C00012	The Reverse Side of the Coin: Some Negative Effects of Research Grants Ekaterina Studentsova Presentation Abstract: The first research grants appeared in Europe in the 19th century. Since that time, the system has grown considerably, both extensively (as its geography has broadened) and intensively (as pressure on researchers to get grants has intensified). Research grants is a financial mechanism which plays a vital role, especially in the countries where science lacks direct public funding. Equally it is a form of scientific capital (following Bourdieu's terminology): a number of research grants which individual researcher or group managed to get is regarded today as a symbol of their success, effectiveness and high quality of research they carry out. These and other factors result in lesser and lesser scientists able to stay uninvolved, but being overall positive and helpful for science, the system also has some negative side-effects. The report aims to give an overview of some potential threats which grant system can bring to science. It is empirically based on results of the interviews carried out with Russian grant-holders by the author and supplemented with evidences from surveys undertaken and published in several countries.

Pre-C00013	The Battle of the Sexes: How Gender Stereotypes Influences Brand Perception Alexandra Hess , Valentyna Melnyk and Carolyn Costley Presentation Abstract: In this research, we investigate the effect of implicit gender cues-as the basis for gender stereotypes- on brand warmth and competence perception. Further, we examine how consumers react to implicit gender cues when exposed to additional warmth/competence cues. We propose a conceptual framework that takes multiple warmth and competence cues into account. The conceptual framework is then used to assess the effects of implicit gender, warmth and competence cue on consumer perception of brands and purchasing intention. Consistent with the conceptual framework, across 2 studies we find that implicit feminine gender cues enhance perceived brand warmth and purchase intention when paired with a high competence cue yet backfire when paired with a low competence cue. On the other hand, implicit masculine gender cues enhance perceived brand competence and purchase intention when paired with low competence cues yet backfire when combined with high competence cues.
